

The Monkeysphere is the group of people who each of us, using our monkeyish brains, are able to conceptualize as people. Most of us do not have room in our Monkeysphere for our friendly neighborhood sanitation worker. So, we don't think of him as a person. We think of him as The Thing That Makes The Trash Go Away. It's the way our brains are built. We each have a certain circle of people who we think of as people, usually our own friends and family and neighbors. Those who exist outside that core group of a few dozen people are not people to us. They're _____.

Remember the first time, as a kid, you met one of your school teachers outside the classroom? Do you remember that surreal feeling you had when you saw these people actually had lives outside the classroom? I mean, they're not people. They're teachers. [3점]

- ① inside our very intimacy boundaries
- ② leading their lives in their own ways
- ③ reminding us of their meaningfulness
- ④ sort of one-dimensional bit characters
- ⑤ not coming to us in any fractional shapes
